

I'm not a robot

My theory took references from established theories in the field. But what's the difference between "from" and "to"? I looked it up and found that both can be used, but "to" is more common in academic writing. So, my theory made references to established theories in the field. I used established theories as a reference point for my work. I had a similar issue with a test question. The teacher marked my answer "in" as incorrect, but I was wondering if it's not also correct. After all, dictionaries show that "reference" can be used with both "in" and "with". So, is "with" the only right answer, or is "in" okay too? Science isn't always logical. If it were, scientists would be out of a job because everything could be explained in reference to a few basic laws. But that would make science boring, as most of the excitement comes from unexpected findings thrown in by experimentation. I agree with Chris K that it's better to say "by referring to" or something similar. I think "with" captures the idea, but doesn't quite fit. Neverbeenkissed made me laugh when they said "proper" English is not always logical. Donbill's suggestion of "by referring to" is a good one, and I'd also accept "through a reference to" or "by way of a reference to". But what really got me laughing was the idea of "sort of". Starting a sentence with a conjunction is frowned upon in "proper" English, but it's not always clear-cut. The author's intention seems to be more important than grammatical rules. The language guide covers verb tenses, conjugation, agreement, prepositions, articles, pronouns, and other grammatical aspects of French and English languages only. No other languages are allowed here. The guide is divided into 26 pages, with each page focusing on a specific aspect of the two languages. paraphrased text here
