If you already have different networked computers at your home, you can create a wireless network with a wireless access point. If you have several computers that are not on the network, or if you want to replace the Ethernet network, you need a wireless router. This is a single unit that contains: a wireless router allows you to use wireless Ethernet signals or cables to connect computers and mobile devices to one another, to a printer and on the internet. Most routers provide coverage for about 100 feet (30.5 meters) in all directions, even if the walls and doors can block the signal. If your home is very large, you can buy inexpensive extenders or backdrops to increase your router's range. Wireless adapters, many routers can use more than one 802.11 standard. Normally, 802.11n routers are slightly less expensive than others, but since the standard is older, they are also more expensive than 802.11ac or 802.11ax. When connecting the router, should start working on your default settings. Most routers use a web interface to change your settings. You can select: the network name, known as the service set identifier (SSID). The default setting is generally the manufacturer's name. The channel uses the router. Most routers use channel 6 by default. If you live in a €
