COLLEGE STATION, Texas (KBTX) - A Brazos Valley doctor who worked for Texas A&M University is charged with sexually assaulting two female patients last year, according to probable cause statements obtained by KBTX following his arrest this week in Brazos County. Dr. Kory Lee Gill, 44, of College Station, is charged with two counts of sexual assault. Online jail records show Gill was booked into the Brazos County Detention Center on Wednesday and released the same day on bonds totaling $60,000. According to the university, Gill specializes in primary care sports medicine and was on the medical staff of Texas A&M Athletics, and served as an assistant professor of Family & Community Medicine at Texas A&M College of Medicine. Gill was also the director of the Texas A&M Family Medicine Residency Sports Medicine Program and is affiliated with several other healthcare facilities in the Bryan-College Station area. The first accusation against Gill surfaced in early 2022 when the survivor went to the police to share her story, according to arrest reports filed by the Bryan Police Department. She told investigators that she met Gill at a clinic on A&M's campus and complained of pain and he offered to treat her for free. The report says the first few treatments happened in front of students as Gill was "using her as a teaching tool for the residents." The fourth treatment occurred at a privately-owned clinic in the area where Gill was contracted to do work through the Health Science Center, according to sources who are familiar with the investigation. At that meeting, in November 2021, the survivor said Gill was drinking whiskey when she arrived and he also offered a drink. The patient said she took one sip and immediately began to feel "buzzed." The report goes on to say Gill offered her a second drink and she accepted it "because the procedure was painful and the defendant told her it was going to hurt." The survivor said during the treatment is when she was sexually assaulted by Gill and then blacked out. She told police she woke up several hours later at her home and didn't remember how she got there. According to the report, the patient later confronted Gill about the assault, and she claims he became emotional and apologized. Not long after the first survivor came forward, a second woman came forward and said the same thing happened to her while under the care of Gill, according to the probable cause statement. Bryan police say they were notified by a Title IX investigator of the new allegations from a woman who said she went to Gill for an exercise-related injury and he offered her free medical treatment. In April 2021, the woman said she was offered alcohol by Gill, and on her final visit with him, he appeared to be "more intoxicated than usual." It was during this visit she said she was sexually assaulted. According to two sources familiar with the investigation, Gill was fired by Texas A&M University following a Title IX investigation in February. KBTX has also confirmed that Gill is no longer working at the clinic where the first alleged assault occurred because he was only contracted to do work there through the university. The same source said alcohol is not and has never been allowed at the workplace, and they were unaware of Gill's use of whiskey while on the job. KBTX has reached out to several departments at Texas A&M University for comment on this story. The law office of James, Reynolds, Spiegelhauer & Ask is representing Gill. "[The law office] is proud to be representing Dr. Kory Gill in regards [to] the allegations that were publicized recently. Dr. Gill is presumed innocent under the law, and we intend to fight these allegations and clear his name in court." Gill's representation said in a statement sent to KBTX. Copyright 2022 KBTX. Last updated: Oct 14, 2022 9:58 am A former Texas A&M team physician has been accused of sexually assaulting two female patients, after plying them with alcohol during medical treatments. Dr. Kory Lee Gill, 44, was arrested Wednesday on two counts of sexual assault stemming from two separate incidents that took place in the spring and fall of 2021. According to a university rep, neither one of the alleged victims was a student at A&M. Texas A&M officials said that Gill was fired from his job as director of the Primary Care and Sports Medicine Fellowship Program in February 2022, following a Title IX investigation that was sparked by allegations of wrongdoing, reported KBTX. He had worked at the university since 2009. KPRC reported that Gill has been accused of sexually assaulting a colleague and another woman with no ties to the university. A graduate of Kansas City University of Medicine and Biosciences College of Osteopathic Medicine, Gill specializes in sports medicine and served as an assistant professor of Family & Community Medicine at Texas A&M College of Medicine, where he had completed his residency in 2008. The investigation into Gill began unfolding in the first weeks of 2022, when a woman went to the Bryan Police Department, saying that the physician sexually assaulted her in November 2021, after offering her whiskey that caused her to black out, according to a probable cause statement cited by KBTX. The woman said she first met Gill at a clinic on A&M's campus and complained to him of hip pain. He offered to help her for free, and the first three treatments took place in front of residents as part of their training, the court filing alleged. The fourth appointment occurred at a private clinic, according to sources familiar with the case. On that occasion in November of last year, the patient claimed that Gill was drinking whiskey and offered her a sip, which immediately made her feel "buzzed." The woman said she accepted a second drink from Gill because the treatment was painful and he warned her that it would hurt, according to the documents. The patient claimed she was sexually assaulted by Gill during the treatment and then lost consciousness. She told police she later woke up at her house but could not remember how she got there. When the patient later reached out to Gill to confront him about the alleged assault, she said he apologized to her, the filing alleged. Not long after the first case came to light, a second woman contacted the police, claiming that she was sexually assaulted by Gill during a medical appointment. The patient reportedly said that in April 2021, Gill offered her an alcoholic beverage while treating her exercise-related back injury for free, and then allegedly sexually assaulted her. Gill was released from jail Wednesday after posting $60,000 bond. A law firm representing him said in a statement that the doctor "is presumed innocent under the law," and that his legal team plans to fight the allegations against him "and clear his name in court."
